Point 1 - Excerpt Laura Smith Haviland

We learned that their lawyer made inquiries while in my neighborhood whether my farm and Raisin Institute were entirely in my hands. When they became satisfied of the fact they left orders for my arrest upon a United States warrant, to be served the following Autumn, if they failed to recover their human property. About the expiration of the time set George W. Brazier went with a gang of slaves for sale to Baton Rouge, Louisiana, and died suddenly of cholera. There his projects ended, and John White soon returned to his work in Michigan.

These circumstances delayed my prospect of going to Cincinnati and Rising Sun to learn the condition of his family, But as money had been raised by the anxious husband and father and his friends, I went to Cincinnati, where I found my friends, Levi Coffin and family. The vigilant committee was called to his private parlor, to consult as to the most prudent measure to adopt in securing an interview with Jane White, John's wife, whose master, Benjamin Stevens, was her father, and the vain hope was indulged that he would not make an effort to retake the family should they make a start for freedom. The committee proposed that I should go to Rising Sun, and, through Joseph Edgerton and Samuel Barkshire and families, obtain an interview with Jane White, as they were intelligent and well-to-do colored friends of John White's in Rising Sun.

Accordingly I went, and called on Joseph Edgerton's eating-house. On making my errand known, there was great rejoicing over good news from their esteemed friend Felix White, as John was formerly called. In conferring with these friends and Samuel Barkshire, they thought the errand could be taken to Jane, through Stevens's foreman slave, Solomon, who was frequently allowed to cross the river on business for his master, and was looked for the following Saturday. But as we were disappointed, Joseph's wife, Mary Edgerton, proposed to go with me to Benjamin Stevens's, ostensibly to buy plums. As there was no

UNDERGROUND RAILROAD.

More Western Memories—How Slaves Were Harbored and Forwarded to Canada Before the War.

To the Editor of the Brooklyn Eagle:

There never was a time when all Americans acquiesced in slavery. The Society of Friends, the original English settlers of Pennsylvania, opposed it, and so from time to time did others; but the real contest dates from 1829, when William Lloyd Garrison arraigned slaveholders as criminals, and from that time on until the Civil War the fight was kept up. Slaves who escaped from their masters and succeeded in getting north of the Ohio River were seldom recaptured. They always found some friend to secrete and pass them along either to Canada or to the Western Reserve in Ohio, then denominated the hotbed of Abolitionism. After the passage of the Fugitive Slave law, in 1850, it became necessary to observe great secrecy in the movements of runaway slaves. Instead of their going North by whatever way came handy, the routes through the free States were systematically and clandestinely arranged. These routes were familiarly known as under ground railroads. The enactment of the Fugitive Slave act to protect property in slaves served practically to arouse Northern sentiment against slavery and to hasten its overthrow. Many of the operators of the underground railroads were colored people. On the other hand some of the worst slave hunters were of that race. A great many slaves escaped out of Kentucky, Tennessee and Missouri into Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. The larger part of them crossed the Ohio into Indiana, where depots were formed in nearly every town on the river, and there were often exciting times, especially when an unusually large and valuable lot of slaves had escaped. Handbills giving descriptions of the fugitive "chattels" were usually scattered through the river counties, both in Kentucky and Indiana. Slave hunters made their appearance openly in the Indiana towns, where they always had allies among the people. Those opposed to the Abolitionists belonged to both the dominant political parties—some of the bitterest opponents of the anti slavery people being among the Whigs.

In a small town in Indiana about fifteen miles from the Ohio line there was an extensive underground depot, and many were the slaves that escaped through it to freedom. Scarcely a month passed but offers of rewards could be seen posted on the trees and fences. They seldom had the effect of recovering the escaped slave. Once a runaway had made his way across the Ohio and into this town he was safe from capture, though some of them were kept secreted for weeks before an opportunity offered to pass them along. The manager of the underground depot at this point was a colored man—a cooper—named Barkshire, who had formerly been a slave, but who had purchased his freedom, as well as that of his wife and four children. He was always well posted as to the movements of runaways, and ready to either hide them till the excitement attendant upon their escape had died out or pass them along. He was constantly on the alert, and many a man and woman passed through his hands on the way to Canada or the Western Reserve. His house was always open as a shelter to the runaways. And he had an ex-slaveholder's help. His former mistress, Mrs. Mary Hawkins, a Kentuckian, resided in the depot town, where she had removed after disposing of her Kentucky farm. She was his able adviser and coadjutor, for after removing to Indiana she became a rabid Abolitionist. One day, in 1852, a great hue and cry was raised over the escape of five slaves—three men and two women—from the farm of Squire James Stevens, of Boone County, Ky., about ten miles from the Ohio River. They were traced to the river but there the clew was lost. Their owner naturally supposed that they had succeeded in crossing the river, and a large reward was offered for their capture. The slave hunters were out in force on the Indiana side. They searched the town above mentioned, the woods, and even Barkshire's house, but no runaways were to be found. Years afterward Mrs. Hawkins revealed the fact that these five slaves had been secreted in her house—no one suspecting her at that time of being in league with her former slave.

At about this time two slaves—young mulatto women—ran away from a farmer named Lodge, in Boone County. They were never captured, though search was kept up for them for months and $500 was offered for their return. On this occasion Barkshire and his family were threatened with lynching by the enraged Kentucklans and some of the pro slavery people of that section of Indiana. Had he crossed the river his life would have been taken without doubt. A plan was said to have been concocted to kidnap both him and his wife and sell them into slavery, but somehow it leaked out and they were put on their guard, and were thus enabled to balk their would be kidnappers. Notwithstanding the threats against their lives the Barkshires, with the aid of their friends, the Abolitionists, continued to operate the underground railroad for years, and no one but themselves knew how many runaways passed through their hands. One of the sons, Arthur, was for years a steward on a steamboat plying between Cincinnati and New Orleans, and many slaves were enabled to reach the free States through his assistance. He was suspected at one time of complicity in the escape of an octoroon girl from a small town in Louisiana, at which place the boat on which he was employed had landed to take on part of a cargo of sugar on the trip up from New Orleans. He had a hairsbreadth escape from lynching and did not again go South for several years. The girl was afterward traced from place to place and finally captured, some months afterward, in Louisville, Ky., to which city she had been enticed from New Albany, Ind. She was returned to Louisiana. Arthur afterward sent an agent to Louisiana to negotiate for the purchase of the girl. The negotiation was successful. She was sent to Cincinnati, where Arthur married her.

Woodford, the youngest member of the railroad firm, was often sent with escaped slaves as a guide. At the time of which I write he was a bright boy of some 18 years and knew all the routes of travel between the Ohio River and the Western Reserve and Canada. He also ran many risks of capture and death at the hands of the slave hunters. He often had to keep in hiding for weeks at a time to avoid them. He was suspected of having aided in the escape of the slave of a man named Platt, in Boone County, Ky. The runaway was the coachman of the Platt family and was missed early in the morning. A posse started in search of him. They traced him to and across the Ohio and into Indiana about five miles from Barkshire's depot. Shortly after the hunters reached the Indiana shore they met a man whom they questioned as to whether he had seen the runaway, giving a description of him. This man had seen young Barkshire only a short time before he met the hunters going toward the town, but alone. If he had been in company with the slave he had hidden him away. A watch was kept over his movements for some time, but he eluded the spies and finally succeeded in piloting the runaway out of their reach. This slave was never captured.

This underground depot was kept in operation until the Civil War broke out, when the necessity for the secrecy demanded by the enactment of the Fugitive Slave law came to an end. When a slave escaped into Ohio, Indiana or Illinois, after the breaking out of the Rebellion, the slave hunters did not follow him further than the Ohio, knowing that it would not be safe to set foot on free soil in search of a runaway. When Barkshire thus found his occupation gone, he did not seem content to remain in the town where he had lived amid excitement for so many years, and finally turned his business of coopering over to his youngest son and removed with his wife to Kansas, where he died in 1865, his wife surviving him but a short time. After the Proclamation of Emancipation was promulgated a number of the runaways returned to and worked for their former masters in Kentucky, among the number being the coachman spoken of above and the two mulatto girls. Their old masters' farms were homes for them and amid all their wanderings they did not forget old associations. And thereafter also there were peace and good will between Kentucky and Indiana, and the inhabitants of the two States mingled together without restraint. The Kentuckians had no more slaves to lose and the day of the underground railroad was passed.

Point 8_ Heirs of Laban Lodge_ Boone County Guardian and Adminstrator bonds 1820-1856

[Guardian's Bond.]

KNOW ALL MEN BY THESE PRESENTS, THAT WE John Pratt & Daniel Pratt

are held and firmly bound unto the Commonwealth of Kentucky, in the penal sum of fifteen hundred dollars, current money, for the payment of which, well and truly to be made, we bind ourselves, our heirs, executors and administrators, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents, as witness our hands and seals, this 5th day of November 1849.

The Condition of this Obligation is Such, That if the above bound John Pratt his heirs, executors, and administrators, shall well and truly pay and deliver to Nancy Lodge Lucia Lodge and Caleb Lodge infant orphans of Laban Lodge deceased of whom he is ~~appointed~~ Guardian, all such estate as now is, or shall hereafter appear to be, due from him to the said Orphans, when they shall attain to lawful age to demand the same, or when thereunto required, by the Justices of Boone County Court for the time being, and also faithfully execute his office herein, in such a manner as to save harmless and indemnify the said Justices, their heirs, executors and administrators from all loss and damage that about the said estate may accrue; then the above obligation to be void, else to remain in full force and virtue.

WITNESS,

M. Hamilton

John Pratt (SEAL)

Daniel Pratt (SEAL)
