Description: This preserve protects two healthy lakes, Spicer Lake and Lancaster Lake, and most of the surrounding wetland basin, thereby protecting large expanses of swamp forest and marsh habitat. These lakes are pothole lakes formed by the melting of blocks of ice left behind when the last glacier retreated from Indiana. Spicer Lake especially illustrates succession from open water to swamp forest. Five acres of open water remain in the center of the lake. This is surrounded by a ring of yellow pond lily-swamp loosestrife marsh. Around this is a spicebush-winterberry-buttonbush shrub swamp which grades into red maple swamp forest. Swamp forest covers most of the preserve. Spicebush dominates the shrub layer within the swamp forest. The shrub and herb layers of the swamp forest vary quite a bit depending on the extent and duration of ponding. There is also a small marsh area with skunk cabbage and rice cut grass in the southwest corner of the preserve.
