OVERVIEW OF EXPERIENCE

Stoddard focuses on the economics of mental health, substance use disorders, and other pressing public health issues. He helps organizations that are working to improve healthcare to design, manage, and evaluate their programs, and is passionate about bringing a focus on public health and health outcomes into the financing and evaluation of care delivery systems. He consults to payers, provider organizations, government agencies, foundations, professional associations, and others.

His expertise is in using data to inform-decision making, including policy analysis, development and evaluation of population health strategies and other interventions, and quantification of the impact of important public health issues, like the social determinants of health. Recent projects have involved mental health parity compliance, integration of physical and behavioral healthcare, the economic impact of the opioid crisis, the mental health impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic, social disparities in healthcare access and health outcomes, economic analysis for behavioral health startups and digital solutions, and population health programs for high-risk patients. He is also heavily involved with developing behavioral health cost and utilization benchmarks for Milliman's *Health Cost Guidelines*TM.

Stoddard helps lead the behavioral health and population health teams and leads his practice's research efforts related to the opioid crisis and a number of other pressing public health issues. His work has been widely cited in the media and other literature.
