The Capitol Tour Office Staff visited the Governor's Residence during a recent training day. In the front row at far right in the photo is Dexter Powell, who has served as butler at the beautiful home for many years. He is also an enthusiastic and informative tour guide who shared with the staff the lovely features of the home as well as its interesting history. The English Tudor Home, located at 4750 N. Meridian, has served as Governor's Residence since 1973. Built in the 1920s, it has been expanded to accommodate public meetings and receptions. Tours of the residence are available each Tuesday by reservation.
James Brown Ray, the fourth governor of Indiana, was the first chief executive to serve in the new capital city of Indianapolis. A governor’s residence had been built in the middle of the "Circle." Governor Ray’s wife, Esther, refused to move into the home, stating that she did not want the public inspecting her washing on the line every Monday morning.

No governor ever lived in the home on the Circle. The Rays moved into a house located on the site of the present Marion County Jail. Interestingly, that old home still exists. It has been moved twice, and now stands at 302 Park Avenue in the Lockerbie Square District. It is considered one of the oldest homes in Indianapolis.

James Brown Ray was lieutenant governor when Governor William Hendricks resigned to take a seat in the U. S. senate. Ray served out the remainder of that term and then won two terms for himself, thus becoming the only Indiana governor to serve over two terms. Ray was a visionary who saw the coming importance of railroads. He developed plans for canals and roads. He also had a flair for the dramatic, as evidenced in this excerpt from "Stories of Indiana" written in 1898 by Maurice Thompson.

“It was in 1825. Three white men had been condemned to death by hanging for the crime of killing some inoffensive Indians. The execution was to be at Pendleton. The prisoners were a father and son and the father’s brother-in-law. The son, a mere youth, had aroused the sympathy of the people, and an appeal to Governor Ray for clemency had been signed by a great many. On the day set for the execution the two older men were hanged, while the boy sat by on his coffin, awaiting his turn at the rope’s end. A vast crowd was present to witness the terrible stroke of justice. The murder had been a most revolting one, in which men, women, and children had shared alike. But when the poor, trembling boy stood upon the scaffold, wildly and pathetically gazing around, everybody felt sorry for him, and hoped that Governor Ray would pardon him. Time passed, yet no word came from the executive, and the drop was about ready, when a shout went up from the multitude. Then all eyes saw Governor J. Brown Ray galloping majestically along in the direction of the gallows. He was mounted upon a superb horse splendidly caparisoned, and was himself dressed in the finest attire. His face wore a look of supreme self-importance. While the crowd gazed, he rode majestically to where the half-crazed young culprit stood, sprang from his saddle, and mounted the scaffold.

“Young man,” he said in a loud voice, “do you know who now stands before you?”
“No, sir,” answered the trembling boy.
“Well, sir, it is time that you should know,” continued the governor, drawing himself up stiffly. “There are, sir, but two beings in the great universe who can save you from death; one is the God of Heaven and the other is Governor James Brown Ray, Governor of Indiana, who now stands before you. Here is your pardon. Go, sir, and sin no more.”

Notes on Governors, compiled by Jim Johnson of the Tour Office Staff, is a regular feature of our newsletter
After leaving the Governor's office, Ray resumed his law practice, lost a bid for Congress and had mixed success in several business ventures. He became ill in 1848 and was taken to a relative's home in Cincinnati where he died of cholera at the age of 54. His grave is at Spring Grove Cemetery in Cincinnati.
