THE PARK STORY

Potato Creek State Park's geological origin spawned the diverse ecosystem that's attracted people for thousands of years.

About 15,000 years ago, the Wisconsin ice sheet ceased its southward advance and began melting. Boulders and other debris broke free, leaving today's landscape.

Potato Creek is a tributary of the Kankakee River and its bordering marsh, once one of the North America's largest. It supported huge populations of waterfowl, fish, and a variety of aquatic plants.

This region was home to the Bodewadmi (Potawatomi) and other tribes who used the edible roots found along the creek and wetlands for food and medicine. The roots' similarity to potatoes led to the creek's name.

In the early 1800s, the rich Bodewadmi lands in northern Indiana were increasingly desired by the federal government. A series of treaties led to the tribe's eventual forced removal.

By the 1830s, European settlers, many of them German immigrants arrived. They drained wetlands and straightened the creek bends to speed water removal and prevent flooding. Wet prairie became crops and pasture. Springhouses and mills dotted the area.

Darcey Worster and his conservation club first proposed a park with a man-made reservoir on Potato Creek in the late 1930s. World War II halted the project, but in 1969, the area was designated to become a park.

Today, the park is dedicated to restoring ecosystems to pre-European settlement conditions, incorporating Indigenous practices such as prescribed burns while managing invasive species, and restoring the creek's original path.

Fish 327-acre Worster Lake, hike or bike the trails, visit the Nature Center, go birdwatching, or plan an overnight stay today.

TRUE TALES

- LOCAL RESIDENTS: Many members of the Bodewadmi (Potawatomi) tribe reside in northern Indiana and southern Michigan where they continue to live in community.
- CREATURE FEATURE: Because of its rich variety of natural habitats, Potato Creek is listed on the Indiana Birding Trail. The park has had nesting pairs of osprey since before the species' reintroduction in the early 2000s.
- CREEK BAPTISMS: During the late 1800s and early 1900s, some churches near Potato Creek held regular baptisms in the creek.

Memories made naturally.
