Local or Topic Experts

A special thank you to the local and/or specific topic experts who donated their valuable time to spend a day in the field identifying resources with the Shive-Hattery team. Your contribution to the project was invaluable—without your assistance and shared knowledge, we would have missed so many resources in need of protection and restoration.

Introduction

Question: Name one of the oldest tourism draws in the state of Indiana.
Answer: The Indianapolis 500

Question: Name the first three things that come to mind when you think of Indiana.
Answer: Basketball. The Indianapolis Colts. Corn fields.

If you feel like playing twenty questions and you’re looking for the answer “Lake Michigan”, these probably aren’t the questions to ask. Mention that you’re going to the Indiana Coast for a business trip, and you will draw some very strange looks. There’s even the true story of a guy from Michigan City who had personalized license plates that read ‘LM’ for Lake Michigan. Imagine his surprise when he traveled to other parts of Indiana and was asked, “Why would someone from Indiana want Lake Michigan on their license plates?”

So what do we know about this little known part of Indiana?

Covered by ice and water for a great amount of time, the unique coastal area of northern Indiana developed as the retreating glacial ice and lowering lake levels left behind the tell tale moraines, sand dunes, and beaches of earlier ages. Finally, the lake retreated one last time, leaving the Valparaiso Moraine to form the continental divide between the water bound for the Mississippi, and the water bound for the St. Lawrence Seaway.

With the passing of the Ice Age, this coastal region still remains ever changing, in a state of restlessness. Once covered in forest, prairie, and marshland, the area has been converted to cities and farmland. Even the ownership of the region has switched hands, with land ownership changing from the Native Americans, to the French, to the English, back to the Native Americans, to the states of Wisconsin and Michigan, and finally to Indiana. Yet through it all, the ever-dominant Lake Michigan has not surrendered its right to shape the land, and the waves and the wind off the great lake continue to chase the living dunes of the coastal region.
What is the Coastal Historic and Cultural Resources Study of the Lake Michigan Watershed? Who is sponsoring the study? What is the purpose of the study?

The Coastal Historic and Cultural Resources Study of the Lake Michigan Watershed, herein referred to as the Coastal Study, is an opportunity to take an in-depth look at this unique Indiana coastal region. Undoubtedly, the glacial sculpting of the area and the affects of Lake Michigan has had a lasting affect on the watershed. The region’s progression from watering hole for mammoths and mastodons, to its present day use for steel mill sites, cities, and agriculture, has left a fascinating trail of culture and history. Without the proper protection and restoration of these cultural and historical resources, the resources of the watershed will follow the mammoths’ footsteps to extinction.

Therefore, the Coastal Study is a tool to assess the existing plans and studies currently being used to guide the protection and restoration of these historical and cultural resources. Are these studies serving their purpose? Are they current in their information and recommendations? Do they cover the topics they should, or are there holes in the information? This Coastal Study also assesses the historic and cultural resources—perhaps the most evident scale on which to measure the success of the existing plans and studies—and identifies areas in need of additional protection and restoration.

The Coastal Study is sponsored by the Indiana Department of Natural Resources. More specifically, it is a joint collaboration between the Division of Water’s Lake Michigan Coastal Coordination Program and the Division of Historic Preservation and Archaeology. These Divisions recognize the necessity of this Coastal Study as the first step towards the preservation and restoration of the historic and cultural resources of the watershed. Funding for this study is provided through a cooperative agreement from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

The overall purpose of this Coastal Study is to offer recommendations for the respective Divisions to consider as they move toward taking the next step. Some of these recommendations will be directed towards a process for selecting which resources are candidates for preservation and restoration. Other recommendations will be made for addressing preservation, restoration, tourism, community organization, and recreation associated with the resources. In addition, this document will identify some of the current trends in the restoration and protection of historic and cultural resources.

Perhaps most importantly, this document will identify how the findings and recommendations of the Coastal Study can be used in the future for steps number two, three, four...
Why are we doing this study?

The previous few pages talk about the purpose of this study—what it’s meant to do, what it will identify, what the end product will be. But the big question hanging out there may be: Why are we doing this study? What have we got to loose if it isn’t done? What happens if, when this study is complete, it just sits on a shelf? Will society suffer? Will the earth stop its rotation?

Sometimes these are pretty difficult questions to answer. However, that’s not the case when it comes to the Coastal Historic and Cultural Resources Study of the Lake Michigan Watershed. By driving through the region and talking to the locals, you can see quite clearly what has happened without the study.

Take a drive by the Wilbur Wynant Residence in Gary. One of only a few Frank Lloyd Wright designs in the state, this example of his American System-Built home sat neglected and ignored for years. Although attempts are being made to save the home, its once fine detail and ingenious construction methods currently sit open to the wind, and the rain, and the snow.

Swing past Union Station in Gary. This structure, an M.A. Lang design, was once the center of activity for people traveling in and out of the region—families on vacation, businessmen traveling to and fro, and Chicago’s finest escaping the city’s hot summer. Step inside the shell of the structure and in your mind’s eye you can fill in the missing plaster, replace the windows and the grand staircase, and see the hustle and bustle of its bygone glory. Sadly, it stands as an empty shell in the dark shadow of the interstate, as the roar of cars and trucks passes overhead.

Venture out into Morgan Township, just south of Valparaiso, and witness the recent demolition of Adam’s Church. This 1869 Italianate structure stood the test of time for over 130 years, one of the watershed’s notable examples of architecture, religion, and construction. Until recently, that is, when it was demolished. Through the rubble you can see the remnants of the pews, and of the piano that accompanied early settlers in hymns.
Perhaps the current condition of these and similar structures is the biggest driving force behind this study. These structures represent what can happen to places like Washington Irving School in Hammond, or The Palace Theatre in Gary, or Dorothy Pavolka’s Orchard in Coolspring Township. These resources are the framework on which the region was built. They show how the watershed developed. They show what the people valued. These cultural and historical resources are a timeline and a diary of the watershed, a record of the people and the places.

So, will society suffer without this study? Can this study make a difference? Can it save these records of our cultural development? The results are hard to predict.

But we’ve seen what has happened without this study…
What geographic area does the Coastal Study cover? Why can this area be considered on a regional basis?

The Coastal Study covers a geographic area defined by Indiana’s portion of the Lake Michigan Watershed. As stated previously, this watershed area was created as a result of glacial activity. There is evidence of several stages of this glacial activity throughout the watershed, including beaches, dunes, and moraines, left behind as the ice receded. Prior to human intervention, the Valparaiso Moraine provided a significant share of the watershed’s defining line.

In some areas, the glaciers left behind the deposits that contribute to the area’s rich farmland and, conversely, the sandy roadbeds. In other areas, streams were carved as the ice melted and drained away. In many areas, the water was trapped, forming large marshes. White pine, cottonwood, sedges, and other vegetation soon covered the watershed. And, near the lake’s edge are the sand dunes—still in a constant state of change—building up and shrinking down at the whim of the wind off the lake, as they have for thousands of years.

Northern portions of four Indiana counties are included in the watershed, with the southern-most tips of the watershed dipping down to include most of the cities of Crown Point and Valparaiso. The counties with land within the watershed are Lake, Porter, La Porte, and St. Joseph. Following this section is a map showing the boundaries of the watershed.

For many geographic reasons, it is evident that this watershed forms a logical region. There are, however, several other reasons why the watershed should be addressed on a regional scale. One of major unifying characteristics is the way in which the region was settled. Early inhabitants of the area were the Native Americans and fur traders who lived and moved about the region’s lakes, swamps and rivers. Actual ownership of the land went back and forth between states before anyone really recognized the opportunities for this area. It wasn’t until the early 1800s when the railroad started to develop, that people began to realize the benefits of the rail, wood resources, water access, and other resources of the region, and then it became an industrial hotbed. With the rail, towns developed, industries grew, and people settled in the region.

The region also developed as a tourist area. The watershed served as a haven for people escaping Chicago. Initially a sportsman's paradise with its rivers, swamps, and lakes, it eventually developed into more of a summer vacation region, with Chicagoans leaving the heat of the city to enjoy summers on the lake. The phenomenon continues today as city dwellers leave Chicago to settle in the region for a more relaxing lifestyle.

Although the woodlands have diminished and some of the early industry has gone by the wayside, the area still remains unique, still attracting tourists, still tied together by the railroad. However, it is also a region that somewhat exists in its own hidden world. A whole different section of Indiana, much different from the rest of the state, it seems to exist almost on the outskirts of the rest of the Indiana. Perhaps it is the geography, and the industry, and the people; but amazingly, after many years, it still all relates back to the Lake.
What can this study do? What are the benefits of this study?

This Coastal Study is the first step of many in the restoration and preservation process. But, it is a crucial first step. It is the recognition that the restoration and preservation of cultural and historical resources in the Lake Michigan Watershed is an important issue. And, it is an issue that needs to be dealt with before it is too late. So what can this study be used for other than just another report to put up on the shelf?

- This Coastal Study can be used in securing funding for future programs and needs. It is a document that says to the people with the money, “See, we have completed a well-researched study that identifies this watershed as one rich in resources. It recognizes these resources as significant in the culture and history of our region. And, it recommends ways in which we can move forward with protecting and restoring these resources. We have a plan.”

- The recommendations in this study can serve as a guide for future programs. It identifies the big picture items that need to be completed as the process moves ahead.

- This document can be distributed and taken to regional officials, residents and organizations, and used as a tool to start coordination on a regional scale.

- For those currently working on restoration and protection within the watershed, this Coastal Study will hopefully be a validation of their efforts—a reassurance to themselves and others that what they are doing is important.

- This document can be used to secure private investment in the next steps of the process, whether it is from banks, donors, or private/corporate investors. This is a document that can, again, show investors what their money will be doing.

- Possibly the most important thing that this study does is it comes out in black and white and says, “There is a need for protection and restoration of cultural and historical resources... within this watershed. There are benefits to putting these pieces together to form a regional effort. There is potential to tie these elements together with some of the recreational aspects of the region. But, bottom line, there is a need for more.”

• What are the existing plans and studies of historic and cultural resources that cover the area? What topic areas do these existing studies and plans cover?

The Lake Michigan Watershed has no shortage of cultural and historical resources, nor does it lack in documentation recording the colorful history of the region. The local historical societies, museums, libraries, university archives, and even the Internet are full of books and maps plotting the trails of early settlement, regaling the deconstruction of the Hoosier Slide, and tracking the genealogy of citizens long since having moved from the region. The records tell who built the buildings, who owned them, what they were used for—even what they cost to build in 1862. Not surprising, however, is the lack of information that governs and guides the protection and restoration of these resources for future generations.

Through the research for the Coastal Study, there were several plans and studies identified as possible references discussing cultural and historical resources within the watershed. In addition, several sources were cited for information on supporting resources, such as corresponding recreation areas that may influence the protection or restoration of a particular resource. These various documents occur in a wide variety of formats ranging from reports, maps, and websites, to the detailed Interim Reports—Indiana Historic Sites and Structures Inventories. These Interim Reports, used extensively as a resource for this study, are the product of surveys completed by the Indiana Division of Historic Preservation and Archaeology in order to inventory the state’s cultural resources on a county-by-county basis.

The topics covered within the assorted documents tend to be more general in nature, focusing on what the resources are, what amenities are affiliated with the resources, the general background of the resource, and the condition of the resource. Topic areas include
National Register designations, site location, style or period of the site, what the site represents, and its perceived importance. However, there are a few more in-depth studies, such as the Historic Indiana document and the Calumet Ecological Park Feasibility Study, that explore more detailed topics regarding protection and restoration, including sections on standards for rehabilitation, legal protection, grants, feasibility, and criteria.

With the exception of a few documents, the most significant documentation tends to focus on statewide or multi-state areas, with few plans and studies focused exclusively on the watershed region.

For additional information see:

- Existing Plans and Studies of Historical and Cultural Resources, in the Lake Michigan Watershed, obtained by Shive-Hattery, Inc.
What is the status, compatibility and comprehensiveness of the existing plans and studies? Where are the gaps and overlaps?

In order to answer this question in an accurate manner, several qualifiers need to be defined. First, this question is being answered in the context of the Coastal Study, focusing on the protection and restoration of historical and cultural resources. This is important to note since the primary intent of this Coastal Study is not to downplay the importance of existing plans and studies, but to evaluate their role and compatibility related to protection and restoration.

Second, this review pertains to the plans and studies that were identified through this study’s process—those found through the consultant’s research, those identified by DNR staff, and others identified through input from the focus group and other sources. We recognize that there are other reports, completed or in process, that were not identified through the research of this study.

With that in mind, the existing plans and studies can generally be regarded in the following manner:

- Documents relating to the detailed topics of protection and restoration of resources, specifically focusing on the watershed area, are virtually non-existent. There are documents, such as The Calumet Ecological Park Feasibility Study and the County Interim Reports, which cover portions of the watershed, but are not limited to just the watershed area. Also, a few other detailed documents exist, including Historic Indiana, which cover specific topics, but on a statewide basis. Detailed topics would include such subjects as feasibility, site management, guidelines for the protection and restoration of resources, funding sources, programming, interpretation, etc.

- The existing documents tend to operate in somewhat of a vacuum, with little relationship to each other or recommendations on how various entities can work together.
• Few of the studies appear to be frequently used, potentially due to the lack of awareness of the studies or limited usefulness relating to protection and restoration of cultural and historical sites.

• With the exception of the newly formed Northwest Indiana Historical Communities group and a few others, there appears to be limited coordination between civic groups, government entities, historical societies, and non-profit organizations in the sharing of information, and joint sponsorship of plans and studies.

• There are few documents that carry little more than informational status. Few of the plans or studies have been adopted by a governing entity, meaning they are not enforceable.

• There is no overall master plan for the historical and cultural resources region discussing such things as regional planning, heritage tourism, marketing, funding, etc.

• Although there are references and resources, there is limited direction for action.

• Although there are documents that discuss provisions for the preservation of natural, architectural, and cultural resources, there appears to be a lack of planning documents that encompass all the issues in one cohesive document.
What assistance and/or programs for the protection and restoration of historic and cultural resources are currently available in Indiana?

Following is a sampling of some of the assistance and/or programs available to Indiana:

Federal Government

Coastal Zone Management Program
- A joint federal and state program developed by The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration to assist in protecting and restoring coastal resources.

National Park Service (NPS)
- Oversees such designations as National Historic Landmark, Historic American Building Survey, and Historic American Engineering Record.

Federal Highway Administration (FHWA)
- Administers enhancement funds through TEA-21 and other federally funded programs.
- Bestows the designations of All-American Road and National Scenic Byway and administers various grants to designated corridors identified for intrinsic values, including cultural and historical resources.

State Government

Indiana Department of Natural Resources (DNR)
- Division of Water
  Administers the Lake Michigan Coastal Coordination Program. Goals include “to improve communications and cooperation among the agencies who participate in activities in the Lake Michigan coastal regions. Provides technical assistance and outreach through such programs as the Lake Michigan Lake Rim Geographic Information System and Shorelines.
• Indiana Division of Historic Preservation and Archaeology (DHPA) and State Historic Preservation Officer
  Administers all federal and state programs related to and including the National Register of Historic Places. The DHPA also is in charge of the Indiana Historic Sites and Structures Inventory, and the Indiana Historic Bridge Survey and Database Program. In addition, the DHPA reviews applications for tax credit on rehabilitations to qualified historic buildings, and administers several grants including the Historic Preservation Fund Matching Grant and the Hometown Indiana Matching Grant.

• Indiana Division of State Parks and Reservoirs
  Oversees the State’s parks and reservoirs, including the watershed’s Indiana Dunes State Park, under the guidance of the DNR’s mission to “protect, enhance, preserve, and wisely use natural, cultural, and recreational resources for the benefit of Indiana’s citizens through professional leadership, management, and education.

Indiana Department of Commerce
• Indiana Tourism Division
  Offers assistance with the promotion of events, festivals, parks and other tourism resources. The Tourism Division also produces Indiana travel guides, maps, websites, etc. In addition, they oversee the Indiana Main Street Program.

Purdue University Cooperative Extension Service
• Provides interaction between the University and local communities by providing classes, assistance, and programs on many topics and issues.

Local Government

• Varying from community to community, local government may provide assistance in the form of funding for library reference areas, local museums, signage, etc. In some instances, local governments are also responsible for the distribution of gaming revenue.
• Many communities will also include cultural and historic sites in their promotion and tourism brochures, websites, etc.

National, State, Regional, and Local Non-Governmental Organizations

• Private organizations can be instrumental in many areas of assistance including fundraising, identifying corporate sponsors, organizing events, and providing volunteers to work as guides or provide labor for maintenance and restoration. Examples of organizations offering assistance relative to the Coastal Study include The Trust for Historic Preservation, and many other local historical, cultural and natural based organizations.

Where is assistance needed?

To simply identify one void, that if filled would sustain all the restoration and protection needs of any project, is comparable to building a sand dune with one grain of sand. In the Lake Michigan Watershed, there are several areas that require assistance to increase the odds of success in the protection and restoration of the region's cultural and historical resources.

Communication: The benefits of good communication are limitless in a project of this scale and importance. Primarily, communication needs to occur between all relevant parties—state government, local government, various communities, private organizations, landowners, general public, corporations, etc. Open communication is crucial for the sharing of ideas and resources, and allows different entities and communities to learn from one another, increasing accuracy and efficiency in the process.

Education: Education is a key factor in the protection and preservation of resources. However, there are many different levels of education. The first place to start is often with educating local leaders and officials on the importance of historical and cultural resources. This type of education then needs to grow to include everyone from school age to elderly citizens. In addition, the groups performing the restoration and protection must also be educated in the appropriate processes and techniques for long term, low maintenance sites.

Legislation/Enforcement: Preservation and protection, unfortunately, is not on the top of everyone’s list of priorities. What looks like a castle to one person, may look like an old dilapidated building to another. Therefore a community may choose to enact some type of legislation on a local level to insure such things as appropriate building in historic districts, directed growth in suburban areas, etc.

Regional Concept: In order for protection and restoration of the historic and cultural resources in the watershed to be successful, this program must be addressed from a regional point of view. The watershed needs an overall regional concept that outlines the goals and objectives for the entire region first, and then moves on towards a more local level. The regional concept, developed through a partnership of local, state, and federal representation, can assist in developing continuity, securing funding and reducing costs.

Master Plan: Once a regional concept is generated, the next step may be for local, state and federal representatives to join together in a voluntary partnership to create a master plan. Far from being a State mandated process, this partnership would be the result of coordination between the local, state, and federal stakeholders of the region. A master plan for the watershed is really an owner’s manual or business plan that guides the restoration and protection of resources throughout the region. In addition to giving direction, a master plan is also a tool to encourage continuity throughout the process, and to assist in securing funds.

Interpretation: You can protect and restore to your heart’s content, but in order for people to understand, appreciate, or enjoy a resource, they need to know what it is and what the story is behind the resource. Restored and protected cultural and historic sites need money to survive. Therefore, they need people who are interested in that site, such as tourists, donors, or volunteers. And, in order to attract tourists, donors, or volunteers, you need interpretation.

Marketing/Promotion: Marketing and promotion is a huge category that spans from promoting and fundraising, to creating a marketing plan that draws in out-of-state tourists. Following the completion of the Interpretation Plan, market and promotion is potentially the next necessity. The regional partnership again may need to coordinate a unified marketing effort for efficiency, continuity, and to create a brand identity for the region.

Tourism: Tourism is considered by some as the driving force behind the restoration and protection of cultural and historical resources. And undoubtedly, tourism is a benefit of the process, especially with the current growth in heritage tourism. Quite simply, most sites need the monies generated through tourism to survive. Again, tourism concepts need to be planned and communicated so they are appropriate for the site’s capacity, accessibility, etc.
Funding: Obviously, funding is crucial to these types of projects, therefore a business plan for securing funds also needs to be prepared, outlining such things as where the money/grants are available from, what the money can be spent on, what are the application deadlines, what are the requirements, how much match is required, who are potential corporate donors, etc.

Professional Guidance: In addition to the many well meaning volunteer groups and committees interested in historic and cultural resources, a regional initiative of this scale needs some professional guidance in order to be successful. This generally means a committee of local individuals, government representatives, organization representatives, and others working with a professional consultant who can assist in guiding the process.
What are the current trends for the protection and restoration of cultural and historical resources?

The protection and restoration of cultural and historical resources has changed immensely in recent years. Gone are the days of simply slapping a plaque on a building or putting up a little sign at the site of a significant event. Protection and restoration of resources is no longer just a casual hobby, it is a business—a business that needs to advance with the current trends in order to compete.

Many of the challenges one encounters in the business world can, unfortunately, carry into the world of cultural and historical resources. In order to protect and restore these resources, you need funding. In order to maintain a structure, you need funding. In order to market and promote a site, you need funding. In order to secure funding, you need corporate sponsorship, or grants, or paying tourists. In order to attract tourists you need a master plan, interpretation plan, and marketing plan. And, in order to get a plan, you need funding. Starting to feel like you’re chasing your tail?

So in order to compete in this dog eat dog, compete with the amusement park world, you need to keep up with the trends. Following are some of the current trends that are encouraging, facilitating, and are really the driving forces behind the protection and restoration of historical and cultural resources.

Heritage Tourism
Definition: “Visitors traveling to see, experience and learn about natural or cultural landscapes, sites, features, objects, people, events and stories.”

John Veverka, Interpretive Specialist

Heritage tourism responds to people’s desire to see, learn, and do. It gives tourists an experience, yet is educational.

Adaptive Reuse
The reuse of historic buildings for a purpose quite possibly different than their original function. For example, the use of a train depot as a museum, or an old warehouse as office space. The resource is protected and the structure has a viable and economically beneficial use.

Interpretation
Interpretive Specialist John Veverka defines interpretation as “a communication process designed to reveal meanings and relationships of our cultural and natural heritage to visitors through firsthand experiences with objects, artifacts, landscapes, and sites.” Basically, it is a process of telling the story of our cultural and historic resources in a way that is interesting and often interactive with visitors.

Managed Growth
Managed growth is the use of such things as zoning and comprehensive planning, and possibly city limit boundaries, to guide community growth. This technique may be used to guide growth for such resources as historic districts, agricultural land, or recreational resources.

Quality of Life
This philosophy adopts the theory that such things as design, development, and restoration need to consider effects on quality of life in their process. How will one’s day-to-day life be affected? Will there still be safe streets, clean air, and nice parks to make one’s life comfortable?

Community Betterment/Community Pride
The protection and restoration of historic and cultural resources definitely falls under the category of community betterment. This whole theory of improving communities through such things as clean-up projects, building restoration, and beautification is often demonstrated through projects like the Main Street Program—inspiring people to take pride in their communities.

Workforce Development
Often tied in with the concept of adaptive reuse, workforce development can be developed on various levels, along with the restoration of historic and cultural resources. One level may be the use of the local workforce in the restoration process itself, providing jobs and business for local citizens. On another level, the adaptive reuse of a building may provide a location for a new business to locate and expand the existing workforce.

Urban Enterprise Zones

The Emerson Neighborhood Plan at work in Gary, Indiana, is a demonstration of how urban enterprise zones can change a community. Urban enterprise zones are established to improve the quality of life in economically distressed urban areas. The zone designation allows opportunities for economic incentives to encourage business development and investment, and assist with job development within the zone. Urban enterprise zones are not just another government program, but require the building of partnerships between government, business, and residents. Urban enterprise zones, like Gary’s, can lead to the revitalization and protection of endangered historic and cultural areas.

Corridor/Greenway Development

Protection and restoration of resources goes hand-in-hand with corridor/greenway development. The Minneapolis Park System demonstrates how connecting historic corridors, historic districts, and parks together can develop successful corridors and greenways linking cultural and historical resources.

Alternative Transportation

The interurban rail system in the Lake Michigan Watershed is a prime example of how alternative transportation systems can contribute to the protection and restoration of historic and cultural resources. The maintained rail line has ensured the restoration and protection of several significant rail stations along the line and perhaps saved resources from expanding highway development.

National Register of Historic Places

Placement on the National Register of Historic Places is a designation given to sites, buildings, districts, etc. that are significant in our history. The Register, originally developed to save historic buildings, provides protection, tax credit, and funding opportunities, as well as the prestige associated with being on the list.
Corporate Sponsorship
Corporate sponsorship is a continuing trend used by many to secure the necessary funding for restoration and preservation of cultural and historic resources. Through a sponsor relationship, resources are often able to do such things as pay staff, do general maintenance, and develop marketing and interpretation materials.

All-American Roads and State/National Scenic Byways
The Federal Highway Administration bestows the All-American Road and National Scenic Byway designation on roadway corridors rich in intrinsic values including natural, historical and cultural resources. Likewise, the state of Indiana can designate its own State Scenic Byways. The designation requires a corridor management plan and interpretation master plan to guide the development of the roadway’s resources. This is an excellent opportunity to tie together and protect the resources of a region.

What is the purpose of the sampling of significant resources used for this study? How were resources identified to be included in this sampling?

One purpose of this study was to develop a database of cultural and historical sites, districts, objects, and buildings of significance. The purpose of this database is to begin to identify some of the areas of need for protection and restoration that may help improve the value, integrity, public access to, and knowledge of significant resources in the future. With literally hundreds of cultural and historical resources within the Lake Michigan Watershed, it would be impossible within the scope of this Coastal Study to evaluate all of the resources. Therefore, it was determined that a sampling of resources would be used—a group of resources that represent a cross-section of all the resources. The resources chosen have no ranking. And, they are, by no means, meant to be displayed as the best resources of their type, or a listing of candidates for restoration and/or protection. They are simply a selection of resources representative of a particular category.

It was determined that several categories should be represented in the sampling in order to show the various types of resources within the watershed. Each of the major counties within the watershed—Lake, Porter, and La Porte—would have representation in each category with one or more resources. Due to the limited area of St. Joseph County within the watershed, it was not possible to identify representative resources in each group for this study. However, the purpose of the categories is to represent the consistency or themes that run throughout the region. The categories used to select resources are as follows:

Downtown Commercial District
This category identifies significant downtown business and commercial districts. These districts may or may not be a designated historic district. The districts may have been chosen as significant for several reasons, including: architecture, representation of ethnic settlement, representation of a once or still thriving business district, effect on community growth and planning, local government, etc.
Industry
This category represents industrial facilities, large or small, that were or still are significant to the watershed. Industrial sites may have been selected due to their influence, good or bad, on the natural landscape of the area. Sites may have been chosen for their longevity in the area, or because of their influence on the social make up, settlement, or decline of the area. Likewise, an industrial facility may have been chosen because of the significant processes or industrial milestones set on that particular site.

Residential District
The chosen residential districts, like the commercial districts, may or may not be an officially designated historic district. However, they were identified as significant for this study for various reasons, such as: architectural significance as a group, a residential area formed in response to other influences (such as Marktown in response to Industry), districts indicative of a certain culture, representative of the evolution of a neighborhood, etc.

Transportation
Significant transportation sites were selected primarily for their effect on the watershed. For example, a particular transportation unit may have been chosen because it moved people, goods, or services in and out of the watershed. A significant transportation route or site might have also been chosen because of its historical significance to settlement of the area, in particular the Native American trails that eventually developed into modern day vehicular routes. Or, a site may have been chosen because it represents a by-gone era of transportation of which there are few remaining artifacts or markers of its existence.

Agriculture
Agricultural sites were also selected for multiple reasons, including: representation of a unique facility or architectural style, representation of a typical Midwestern agricultural operation, representation of a by-gone era, or representation of an agricultural practice threatened by growth and development.
Natural/Green Space
Green space with the ‘natural’ qualifier is an area significant, perhaps, due to its indication of the watershed’s history—a site that demonstrates how the land changed over time. It may also be an oasis or pocket of ‘natural’ area that has been protected or restored over time, and represents what used to be the natural make up of the land. These are spaces that are meant to be enjoyed for their natural uniqueness and beauty.

Recreation/Green Space
Green space with the ‘recreation’ qualifier may or may not fit into the natural/green space category. But primarily, these are green space areas that are or were significant areas of active recreation—parks, trails, etc. Also, these sites may be significant because of events that took place on that site, past land use, architecture within the green space, etc.

Significant Architecture
An architectural resource may be public or private, residential or commercial, old or new. There are numerous reasons why a resource may have been chosen as significant in the architecture category, a few of which are: representative of a certain era, a one-of-a-kind example of an architectural style, construction methods, architect, ethnic representation, representation of the watershed’s influence on settlement or architectural development, unique elements within the architecture, etc.

Culture/Education
Although the primary criteria for selection of a culture/education site is the influence of an educational facility on the culture, people and development of the watershed, there are other factors that make these educational resources significant to the culture and history of the watershed. They factors may include: campus architecture and/or sculpture, historical records and archives, topics and courses taught therein, etc.

Culture/Religious
Religious resources such as churches or shrines are significant for their importance in representing the culture and value system of the area. However, these culture/religious resources are also significant because of their representation of the ethnicity and settlement of the area, their significant architectural style or representation of a particular era or culture, their construction methods, and their sculpture and art, just to name a few.

Cultural/Sculpture

Sculptural resources are significant for various reasons. Obviously, they may be indicative of the culture and values of the residents within the watershed—they may indicate ‘sophistication’ or ‘tastes’ of a particular era. However, they are also a reflection or perhaps even a diary of the development of society within the watershed. The sculpture may be a representation of local artists or materials. Sculpture or collections may indicate a time of prosperity in the watershed. And, they are definitely a reflection of the ethnic diversity of the area.

Railroad

Due to the major influence the railroad played in the development and settlement of the region, it was given its own separate category. Obviously, the rail was important for moving people, goods, and services to and from the region. The rail was significantly important to the economy of the area as an employer and also as a way to bring tourists to and from Chicago and other locations. The railroad stations are a significant representation of society, architecture, economy, and change.

Cemetery

Cemeteries are perhaps one of the most significant resources within the watershed. To begin with, they were some of the region’s earliest parks. They are a history book of settlement, war, medical tragedy and triumph, economy, style, sculpture—the list goes on and on. With the ever-increasing interest in genealogy, they remain a valued record of who we are, where we came from, and where we’ve been.

Bridges

Bridges were also deemed a historical and cultural resource worthy of their own category because of their significance in the development and history of the watershed. Specific bridges were chosen for, among other things, their architecture, engineering, uniqueness and/or representation of a certain era.

Native American Sites

Certain Native American sites were chosen as particularly significant because of their importance in the settlement of the area. These are the trails and sites that were in place long before the trees were cut down, the marshes filled in, and the dunes moved around. They are routes and sites that were significant for many reasons including: for transportation through the area, as meeting places, or as representation of the Native American culture.

Again, since there are far too numerous resources within the watershed to review each one, a process was developed to narrow the resource list to the one or two that would represent the category for each county. The resources were chosen by their repetitive appearance in several areas. First, they may have been listed in the county Interim Reports. Or, they may be National Historic Register Sites. Others were resources that stuck out during visual driving tours. Still other resources just kept appearing in various documents, or were recommended by the focus group. In review, we found that these were the sites that kept reappearing and so, they were selected to represent the various categories.

Within the Lake Michigan Watershed, there are several significant federally funded resources, such as the Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore. Although these resources are culturally and historically important, no federally funded sites are included in the list of significant sites. This study was partially funded with federal dollars to examine resources outside federal ownership. Although not fundable, federally owned historic sites are an important part of planning for historic resources in the watershed.

What criteria may be considered in the future for designating resources as significant?

Creating criteria for any type of designation is always a difficult task. Oftentimes, the use of criteria is looked on as a form of elimination—the ‘if your test scores aren’t high enough, you won’t get into a good college’ threat. Does that mean that if a resource doesn’t make the cut that it wasn’t important in the history of this region? Does it mean that a piece of history is eliminated for future generations?

In that light, the criteria assembled within this study are meant to be a checklist for accomplishments. Similar to a hurdler at the Olympics, with the hurdling of each criteria, a resource is one step closer to the prize. It is a difficult task to determine, from any one perspective, what is significant and what is not. Depending upon what exactly the ranking of significance is used for, the criteria may even change slightly. However, listed below are some examples of criteria that may be considered in the group of accomplishments on a resource’s ‘race’ to become significant.

- A cultural or historic resource that represents an important contribution in the development of the region, Indiana or the United States.

- A resource that represents a unique period in history that played a pivotal role in the development of the region.

- A resource that is unique to the region, a “one-of-a-kind”, or a resource that is part of a group of resources that have unique qualities.

- A resource that is the best representation of its type and can be reasonably restored or protected.

- A resource that may no longer be visible but has specific significance (trail, building, etc.) and can be interpreted through other means.
• A location that is important to the history or culture of the area due to an event that occurred on that site.

• Resources that are important for their design, engineering, style, art or architectural features.

• A resource specifically related to a person or group of people who are important in the culture or history of the region.

• A resource that represents a scarce or unique feature in the region.

• A newly built resource, such as a museum or interpretive center, whose purpose it is to house the artifacts, tell the story, preserve, or educate on the historic and cultural resources of the area.
What are the recommendations offered by Shive-Hattery, Inc. for consideration regarding preservation, restoration, tourism, community organization, and recreation?

There is, of course, no one perfect solution that will meet the needs of all the resources of the region in a low cost and efficient manner. When it comes to protection and restoration there rarely is a ‘quick fix’. There are, however, several general recommendations that can help the effort develop on a big picture level. These are recommendations that apply to the region as a whole, although there are definitely more specific, detailed recommendations that will be needed for individual sites as they are studied on a case-by-case level.

Recommendations for Improved Protection and Restoration Efforts

- Develop ordinances, legislation, and/or enforceable guidelines to protect historic and cultural resources within the watershed. In order for protection efforts to be successful, there needs to be some type of review and consequence of actions. This can and should occur at all levels, including local and state government.

- Educate public officials, general public, volunteers, organizations, etc. Protection is not simply a topic to be mentioned in 4th grade state history with hopes that kids will go home and tell their parents and all will be well in the world. Education needs to start at the top and work its way down. Provide information to your state elected officials on why this region is important to the state of Indiana and why the protection of its historic and cultural resources is a vital economic issue. Let your U.S. Congressmen know what your programs are and where you need grants and funding. Educate local governments on the benefits of ordinances and codes for protection of these resources. And, don’t forget to stop in when the 4th grade class is talking about state history.

- Identify funding options. This needs to be a concentrated regional effort to identify the potential funding sources for protection. Funding can come from a multitude of sources, such as national, state, and local government. But, funding can also come from corporate donations, civil organizations, private organizations, and private citizens. There are obscure little organizations out there that are often focused on a very specialized topic. Oftentimes, it’s an individual who may have a pet interest in a certain area. Who knows, maybe Bill Gates has a special interest in maritime history?

- Identify resources for assistance. This is as important, if not more so, as identifying funding. One of the most important things to remember in protection and restoration is that 9.9 times out of 10, you are not the first group to be doing this. Don’t try to recreate the wheel. Begin by identifying areas for assistance that can save you time and effort and provide at least an area to get started. For example, contact the City of Boston for a copy of their building ordinances regarding historic structures. Have a specialist come in and hold a two-day seminar on organizing volunteers. Identify a successful program from another area or another state and have a program representative visit with you about what worked and what didn’t. How would they do it differently if they had to do it over again? Most successful government entities and organizations are more than happy to share their successes with others.

- Work together with other regional and national organizations and programs, such as the states organized under the Coastal Zone Management program. Again, find other entities with like challenges and opportunities to learn and share with. These affiliations can be beneficial in many areas, including funding and tourism opportunities.

- Develop a regional master plan. This item is discussed more in-depth in the regional section, but the overall philosophy is that you need to start with a plan. There needs to be direction to the efforts for an efficient, unified front.

- Complete a regional interpretive master plan. All of these resources are of no benefit if they are not interpreted for others to learn from and enjoy. This is again one of the most crucial elements in the success of the protection and restoration efforts. The resources need to educate, they need to serve a purpose, and they need to create interest and tourism. That is how the resources perpetuate themselves.

- Develop relationships with colleges, organizations, etc. This is a great opportunity to share benefits, educate, and accomplish protection and restoration goals. Team up with local resources. For example, can the horticulture or landscape architecture students at a local university assist with plans for a park restoration? Can this park be a living, outdoor classroom? Can a graduate student in history contribute research to the interpretation plan explaining the Native American culture in the watershed? These are great opportunities for mutual benefit.

Recommendations for Tourism

- Complete a regional tourism and marketing plan with input from a regional partnership of local, state, and regional representatives. This goes hand in hand with the development of the regional master plan and interpretation plan. Find out who your market is and what needs to be done for additional market development. Who may be interested in experiencing the various resources? How can these resources be packaged for regional development and tourism? What other amenities such as restaurants, information centers, and rest stops are needed throughout the region? Where and when can advertising dollars be used the most effectively?

- Develop an interpretive master plan. Again, tourists want an experience. An interpretive master plan needs to be developed in order to present the resources in an interesting and educational format, so tourists will enjoy their experience, return for more, and tell others about their experience.

- Organize regional entities. A necessity in the success of this area as a regional tourism destination, which can support the resources of the watershed, is regional organization. This means the organization and cooperation of the various convention and visitors' bureaus, chambers of commerce, local events and festivals, etc. Not only is cooperation among these entities important for tourism, but it can also mean pooled resources and cost savings.

- Identify regional attractions. This, of course, relates to the need for the overall regional master plan. In this process, all significant historical and cultural resources would be identified and mapped in relationship to natural resources, recreational features, roadway corridors, etc. This would then assist in the development of tours, themes, etc.

- Develop an effective and diverse range of marketing materials to include such items as websites, videos, maps, audiotapes, brochures, etc. to reach an expanded number and wider range of tourists.

Recommendations for Organizing Communities

- Identify “go to” people and local specialists who can assist with protection and restoration on a regional level. This may be a list including everything from local historians and historical archives, to a list of qualified contractors who have excellent craftsmanship for re-milling historical moldings. This would serve as a reference list for groups and organizations working on the resources, marketing plans, etc.

- Develop a regional organization. This is a vital element in the success of the watershed as a regional resource. Although having smaller groups work on individual projects is very important and will continue even under a regional organization, this regional group allows for the pooling of funds and resources, and puts forth a unified effort towards protection and restoration.

- Develop a database for shared information. This database is an opportunity to share the knowledge and benefits developed in points one and two of this section. By putting this information together in a database format, it will be easily assessable and easily managed, so therefore, it will actually get used.
• Identify regional funding efforts. Improved community organization can be valuable on many fronts, but one of the most important is the unified funding effort. Pursuing funding on a regional level is critical in obtaining some of the special funding. In addition, the representation and backing of a regional organization can increase the comfort level of those apprehensive about donating to a smaller, perhaps less organized, resource.

• Assist with regional planning for interpretation, marketing, and tourism. A unified regional organization can help coordinate the regional planning, marketing, and tourism efforts, as well as be at the forefront when it comes time to share the information with local governments, organizations, and citizens.

Recommendations for Associated Recreation
• Although there will be the potential of some tourists coming to the area based solely on their interest in the various cultural and historical resources, the market groups can be significantly broadened if there is diversity in the offerings of the region. People like to experience a region, to feel what it might be like to live in that place, or what it may have been like living there during a previous time in history. In order to attract visitors from a variety of age groups, including young adults and young families, there also needs to be diversity in activities and the opportunity to experience recreational and natural activities, in addition to historical and cultural. A condensed version of some of the potential recreational activities identified through this study include:

  - Guided dune excursions
  - Walking/Bike trails
  - Park and public garden development
  - Train excursions
  - Scenic Byway development
  - Water related recreation: boating, shipwreck diving, swimming, etc.
  - Orchard experiences/Pick your own/farm visits
  - Picnicking, outdoor concerts, etc.
- Skiing, skating, snowmobiling
- Town celebrations and ethnic festivals
- Unique shopping experiences
- Bird watching, plant walks, wildlife viewing, etc.
- Local art and culture activities
- College sporting activities

Recommendations for Regional Coordination

- Develop volunteer and hospitality training programs. Volunteers and hospitality workers are the first connection to tourists, potential donors, etc.—your front door people to resource protection and restoration. Volunteer and hospitality work training programs can improve this front line contact to assure a good first experience for tourists and visitors to the region.

- Improve signage. One of the most frustrating experiences is being in a strange place and not knowing if you’re on the right track. Improved signage can help comfort visitors to the various resources and direct increased numbers of visitors to experience the various resources.

- Develop a long-range strategic plan. This should be done on both a regional and resource-by-resource basis. This strategic planning process helps turn the master plan, marketing plan, and other projects into reality by tracking funding, schedule, phasing, etc. In addition, a strategic plan can be a very strong tool when trying to secure funding for programs, since it shows process for completing the various components.

- Expand partnerships with regional, state and federal agencies and organizations for increased assistance with research, interpretation, restoration, etc.

- Develop sponsorship or membership relationships with corporate and private entities to support protection and restoration activities.
• Develop interpretation and educational guidance in order to improve the experience at various resources throughout the region. This would help educate resource site managers so that they can share their resource better with site guests.

• Develop an opportunity for managers of the various resources in the watershed to coordinate with one another, and share experiences and ideas with their colleagues. By sharing thoughts and ideas, resource managers would be able to learn through others and eliminate unnecessary frustrations and costs.

• Develop a regional, chamber of commerce type, business group to recognize businesses supportive of the restoration and protection of resources in their area. This business group would benefit the businesses by opening up marketing and sponsorship opportunities. In addition, businesses would identify themselves as members of say the Lake Michigan Watershed Chamber of Commerce, thus getting the word out to the public on the regional concept.

• Create a regional staff to oversee the various marketing, fundraising, volunteer, etc. efforts and monitor their success. This regional staff could possibly be developed with the assistance of the Northern Indiana Regional Planning Commission. Again, this would help coordinate efforts and eliminate duplication, while putting all the watershed resources forward with continuity.

Assessment of Feasibility

• Tie specific project proposals to other community development or economic initiatives and activities such as Brownfield programs, land use, tourism, and work force development. Emphasize continued and increased efforts on making preservation and conservation of historic and natural resources ‘keys to the success’ in other economic initiatives.
• Conduct comparative assessments. Identify other successful, as well as unsuccessful, projects that serve as comparative case examples for new or proposed projects.

• As public funding may become available, emphasize that the public funding portion be used as leverage to secure and attract private investment funds.

• Consider the long-term perspective for determining the feasibility of a proposed project: funding, planning, construction, maintenance, business plan, operations, promotion, terms of future transfer of property ownership, etc.
How can the restoration and protection of historic and cultural resources be assisted on a regional level?

There is no doubt that this watershed represents a unique region in the state of Indiana, and quite possibly the entire country. The diversity displayed within this region covers everything from industry to orchards, from natural resources to railroads, and from Native American trails to international architecture. This is a region that abounds with history; an area quite literally shaped both geologically and culturally by the effects of ice and water over many years.

Three sentences, and three references to the word ‘region’. This is not coincidental. This is a ‘region’ of significance. And the best opportunities for protection, restoration, and recreation lie in this regional aspect. The old adage, ‘strength in numbers’, applies so very accurately to this region—a region fighting to preserve its culture and history, yet struggling for its identity. Regional, however, also means that local, state, and federal entities need to work together for this regional approach to be successful.

Restoration and protection of resources can be assisted on a regional level in the following ways:

Regional Master Planning
- Mapping and identification of resources on a regional scale to establish patterns and themes throughout the area
- Planning for distribution of regional needs such as gateway centers, information centers, wayside rest facilities, etc.
- Development of a regional goals and objectives, gathered through input from local, state, and regional representatives, and creation of a phased plan for completion
- Development of a master plan document to be used in funding, marketing, etc.

Identification of Regional Funding Sources
- Utilization of the regional approach to identify funding sources that are looking for a ‘regional context’ component in applications for grants and funding, such as TEA 21 and other regional DOT funding programs, regional planning district funds, regional corporation and gaming monies, etc.

State or National Scenic Byway Designation
- Organization of resources along a roadway corridor could lead to a State or National Scenic Byway Designation. This can open up doors to funding, marketing, and other benefits.

Region-wide Educational Programs
- Again, one of the key components in restoration and protection of cultural and historical resources is education. This includes educational programs that start in the elementary schools and continue all the way to the legislator’s office in the Statehouse. By developing regional education programs, costs can be shared between counties and school districts, meetings and presentations can be organized for large groups, and overall, more people can be reached with fewer dollars.

Regional Marketing and Publicity Planning
- Similar to the education program, regional marketing and publicity can reach more people for fewer dollars. Regional campaigns and brochures can be developed, as well as regional branding, regional tours, etc. The Northern Indiana Harbor Country promotion for La Porte County, is a prime example of how this can work.

Pooling of Funds and Resources
- For one lone museum or historical site to develop a brochure is a major undertaking, but if that lone museum pools its funds with several other museums, the road to a brochure just gets a lot easier. But perhaps more important than funds, is resources. No longer does each site need a historian or an architectural guru, or a graphic artist. These are resources that can be shared effectively and be cost efficient on a regional level.
What might be the next steps?

Now that the Coastal Study is complete, the obvious first question is, “Where do we go next?” What is step number two? That can be a difficult question to answer. It may depend on when the next funding is available. It may depend on how much funding is available. And, it may come down to where the funding is coming from and what the priorities are, at that time, with the people that are making the decision on where the money should go. But all that aside, what would the next step be?

Availability of the Study

Perhaps one of the biggest complaints we heard about previous studies was two-fold. First, the studies were unavailable. Second, nothing ever happened with them—they just sat on a shelf and were forgotten. So, the primary next step is to get the study out where people can look at it. Make it available to local business groups; federal, state, and local government representatives; local residents and organizations, etc. Availability may occur through local libraries, direct mail, and websites. In addition to making it available, develop a way for people to comment on the study, offer their support or criticisms or ask questions.

Small Group Meetings

Once the study has been distributed and people have a chance to comment, it is time to start to gather people together. This is the start of the active next steps. Small group meetings, made up of a cross-section of representatives, provide an opportunity to build support, get commitments, and identify stakeholders. Basically, it is an opportunity to get people together and assure that the study is on the right track and to make sure that there is local, regional, and state buy-in for moving ahead.

Selection of Next Steps

Once the initial small group meetings are complete, the stakeholders and interested parties can then advance into prioritizing what the next steps may be. There are potentially three ‘big picture’ next steps: securing an official designation for the watershed area, developing a regional master plan, and developing a regional database. In addition, there are numerous miscellaneous steps that may focus on one particular topic or focus area, or may just be a little smaller in scope than the ‘big picture’ steps. These lists and ideas were developed with the input of a local focus group.

Official Designation

One ‘big picture’ next step may be to evaluate the pros, cons, and feasibility of an official designation for the coastal region. There are several different options including state or federal scenic byways and heritage area designations. Affiliation with the byways and heritage areas can offer benefits for signage, marketing, etc. These designations also provide another way to tie the region together around a common theme. However, it would need to be determined whether this would indeed be beneficial in accomplishing the goals of the group, what economic impact it would have, etc.

Regional Master Plan

Another ‘big picture option’ would be to complete a Regional Master Plan. This master plan would be an effort that would include input from government agencies and representatives on a local, regional, and state level; local organizations and citizens; corporate and industry representatives; etc. It would begin with the development of a database and mapping of all identifiable significant resources in the watershed—where are they located, what is their status of protection or restoration, what are their needs, etc. This would be overlaid on a map showing natural and recreational resources, roads, towns, etc. With that complete, themes, goals, and objectives could be developed, as well as a phasing plan for moving ahead with future steps, such as:

- Regional Cultural and Historic Resources Committee to aid in the development of legislation, guidelines, programs, etc. within the watershed
- Regional Education Programs
• Regional Interpretation Plan
• Regional Marketing Plan
• State or National Scenic Byway Status for one of the roadways within the region

Regional Database

This database could be developed as a way to share information among the various stakeholders in the watershed. There are literally hundreds of items that could be stored in the database format, but the key is to develop databases that can save people time and frustration, as well as listing go-to people for information. Some of databases listings may include:

• Historical Society Contacts
• Licensed Contractor Lists
• Resource Lists
• Websites
• Funding and Grant Resources

Miscellaneous Next Steps

• Identify trails across all counties
• Encourage graduate student and advanced research
• Utilize study document in potential funding applications
• Develop map of sites as a display for sites/museums
• Utilize the IL-MI Heritage Corridor as an example or a partner
• Coordinate with the Calumet Heritage Partnership
• Relate to the Auburn – South Bend Auto Heritage Corridor
• Coordinate with the Lincoln Highway Association
• Base ideas on the concept: One Ecosystem – One Region
• Show benefits of the study ideas and moving ahead with the next steps
• Work through NW IN Historical Community
• Develop a coordinating body/entity
• Develop a forum to publish or display local info
• List contact information including a description of expertise or site management
