tables for the local publication houses.

By 1903, Theodor Eismann had retired and his son Eduard Theodor Paul Eismann had taken over running the company. Theodor Eismann's brother, professor Gustav Edmund Ernst Eismann, was a co-owner and headed a branch of the company in New York City.

By this time, the company moved its primary focus to producing postcards for the U.S. market. Protective tariffs in 1909 hit the Eismann Company hard, but by 1912 the company had moved to New York and was still primarily in the postcard business. By the mid-1920s, the company had expanded their offerings to include labels, posters, catalogs and offset printing. Toward the end of the 1920s, the company appeared to be in decline with reduced offerings and only 15 employees. In 1930, the Theodor Eismann Company filed for bankruptcy.

The postcards created by the Eismann Company had themes ranging from popular spots - not only within Germany - but around the world, featuring daily life and people from different cultures. They also produced subject cards, primarily romantic themes that could be sold in different countries. The postcards produced for the U.S. markets had views of New York City and other domestic locales, along with patriotic and holiday postcards.

The Christmas-themed postcard shown above was created by the Theodor Eismann Company and was sent to a young Robert Ingalls in 1907, prior to his family's move to Bedford. It's part of the Osie Alice Ingalls Clark Collection.

The Indianapolis Public Library was recognized for their contributions to the Federation with the ILF Collaboration Award.

The ILF Collaboration Award recognizes a corporation, organization, individual library or a group of libraries that has made significant contributions in a collaborative way toward the promotion of library services in a community, region or statewide level. Nominees must exhibit a collaboration not older than three years in areas such as programming, technical services, library collections or other cooperative ventures.

IndyPL is recognized for their digital Encyclopedia of Indianapolis. The Indianapolis Bicentennial Commission recently designated the digital EOI as a legacy project. Created at the Polis Center at IUPUI in collaboration with numerous community partners as an open access, web-based knowledge platform - freely available on desktop, tablet and mobile devices - the EOI includes over 2,000 core entries, timelines, feature articles and an atlas for Indianapolis.

“Updating the 1994 print encyclopedia content and developing an interactive digital platform to present this information was an ambitious goal and a herculean task”, said U.S. District Court Judge Sarah Evans Barker.

The work of the IndyPL EOI team also breaks down barriers, said Greg Petrowich, president and CEO of WFYI Indianapolis. “It is a collaborative that benefits learners at all ages and stages of academic preparation, the casual seeker, a real or armchair tourist and author – and so many others.”
